The event sequence definitions are then passed to a TH model that estimates the temporal variation of temperature, pressure, and heat transfer coefficient in the RPV downcomer characteristic of each of the sequence definitions. These pressure, temperature, and heat transfer coefficient histories are passed to a PFM model. The PFM model uses the TH output, along with other information concerning plant design and materials of construction, to estimate the time-dependent driving force to fracture produced by a particular event sequence. The PFM model compares this estimate of fracture driving force to...
